On being a farm wife

-And other hazards

By JOYCE BUPP

There are some things in life that are absolute.

Death. Taxes. Rain just after you wash the windows.

And the milk inspector showing up the day that the scrape-out tractor conks out or the water pipes have frozen up solid.

Milk inspectors are a dairy farm fact of life, like flies in summer. (I'm just kidding guys—our farm inspectors happen to be some of the neatest in the business.)

I've often wondered, though, how many American homes and yards would get passing grades on some of the 76 items listed on the farm inspection "report card" sheet hanging out in the milkhouse?

For instance: Yard clean and free of litter - You get a black mark here if there are any bicycles, bats, balls, sleds or roller skates scattered around.

No swine or fowl - I flunked this section the unforgettable day that Snort, the butchering pig, greeted the preacher's wife at the front door. (But, that's another story.)

Floors of impervious material, clean and in good repair - If you're missing a tile, or the carpet is worn or snagged, or you haven't mopped up for the last twelve hours, this one goes against your score.

Doors and windows closed during dusty weather, adequate ventilation, adequate lighting facilities and building of sufficient size. Holes punched in screendoors by dog paws earn you 20 demerits.

Work area must have suitable water heating facilities with water under pressure piped to faucets - If your daughter took a shower recently, a hot water check will get you only a lukewarm mark on this one.

No pesticides or medicinals stored in house area - Simply this rule by forbidding anyone in your household to get sick.

Soap, running water and individual sanitary towels in washroom and convenient to work area - The inspector will probably fault you if the soap is melting away under the water, which is still running after the last kid's use, and the individual towel happens to be located under his feet.

Animals clipped and brushed - Make an emergency appointment with the barber.

If you fail to meet the standards of this inspection checklist, you will promptly be cut off from the market for housewife services.

Let's hope this new inspection program soon gets underway.
