

National Central Bank is now Hamilton Bank.

We've changed our name. Your friends at National Central Bank are now your friends at Hamilton Bank.

We've taken the word "national" out of our name because we've withdrawn from the Federal Reserve System, and are now a state-chartered bank, just like many other banks in this area.

For a number of years, the National Central management has asked that Federal Reserve member and non-member banks be treated as equals with respect to the forms in which they are permitted to maintain their reserves against deposits. Although Congress has considered various proposals for easing the burden of Federal Reserve membership, no actual changes have been forthcoming.

As Hamilton Bank, we're still a member of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC), and all deposits are still insured exactly as they were before.

You can still use all your National Central checks, passbooks, Master Charge and VISA cards, and any other forms with National Central on them. The new name will appear on your next order of checks. Other documents can be used indefinitely.

You may continue to see National Central signs in front of some of our offices for a while... our new Hamilton Bank signs will be going up as soon as they're available.

Of course, the same friendly, helpful people are in your local office, ready to serve you. And you'll continue to enjoy all the services we've always provided.

In fact, the only thing that's changed is our name. And that's a change you helped us make. To find a new name, we conducted a research study in the six counties we serve, and Hamilton Bank was the clear favorite. So, now, National Central Bank is Hamilton Bank. And with that new name we'll continue to work just as hard as we can to give you more for your money, more for you.
