

Lancaster County provides much of the stimulus for Catherine's paintings. The plain folk here are one of her favorite subjects.

Catherine Kohl

for the job was help placing the Heatator into the opening.

For the past sixteen years, Catherine has been spending her time not only with a trowel and hammer, but also with a paint brush. She spends her time working in oils.

Catherine's works are deep toned glossy paintings of rural life, especially Lancaster County and the plain sects. She is a member of Berks Art Alliance, and has exhibited in at the Reading Museum.

One of the rooms on the first floor of their home she has outfitted with easel, sink and tables to accommodate her hobby. The room gets frequent use attested by the fact that the walls in it and other rooms in the Kohl household are lined with paintings.

Catherine said her husband has the farm in alfalfa and sells it rather than feeding it because the price on steers in the past year or so has been too uncertain. She said he is an avid reader of LANCASTER FARMING. He checks the paper for market prices and she is careful never to throw it away until late Friday, just before the next issue arrives.

Catherine says she and her husband are building a place for them to live and work when her husband retires. And with every stroke of her brush or hammer, she gets closer to nailing that future down.

Catherine is seated in front of a fireplace front she built. The Kohls have spent countless hours restoring their farm home. Catherine says the first three homes she helped to build and this one she has done a lot of the restoration work herself.

The artistic touch in Catherine is demonstrated by this artful use of a big tree stump as a flower bed.
