A scowl crossed his face and his mouth drooped in a pout. I had mentioned - no, I had ordered - that, if we were going to get through this 4-H demonstration the youngsters planned to prepare, someone had better get a move on and start practicing. That suggestion hadn't suited him at that particular moment, and our son's long face was the result. "Oh, don't look so grouchy," I teased. "I'm not grouchy," he rebutted. "I just like to keep my eyebrows down low like this." His sister and I cracked up, laughing so hard that he had to give in and grin, too. Instantly, the lowered eyebrows raised to their normal, happy location on this nine-year-old countenance. But, "I'm just keeping my eyebrows low" has become synonymous in this farm household with being perturbed or frustrated about something. And I've noticed that certain events can trigger me, too, to drop these eyebrows to the low-tide mark on my face. Like: —the well-aged groundhog I ran through the lawnmower after we had removed it from the yard at least three times; —trying to move Peggy and Hallie, the "hardheads" of the dairy herd, into their proper stalls after they've tried out at least a half-dozen of the wrong ones; —cows that bawl to be let out, and then stand at the gate a half-hour later bawling to be let back in; —the nail that poked up through the right rear tire of my car; —holes in two brand new pairs of socks that we found as we removed them from the plastic packaging (and they're going back!); —the checkbook stub balance which never, never, never agrees with the balance on the bank statement; —dealing with people who go through life with permanently lowered eyebrows.
