On being a farm wife - And other hazards

Joyce Bupp

John Steinbeck, taking a quote from Shakespearean writings, once penned the book "The Winter of our Discontent."

This year is bringing me to grips with "The Summer of my Disillusionment."

Maybe it was the gray hair that started it.

But, gee, I don't feel old. Except for those 90 degree days with 95 percent humidity that find us stacking hay away.

It was probably on one of those nights that I found the gray hair. One lone hair wouldn't bother me. But it isn't the very first. And I know full well it won't be the last.

During a recent eye examination, our family optometrist informed me that I'm "getting" to that point where we begin testing annually for glaucoma. That's an irreversible eye disease more likely to be found in older peoples' eyes.

I've begun wearing the hand-me-downs of our daughter.

And we sent the "baby" of the family (who'd just die if he read that) off to camp for the first time.

My pointed-toe shoes from two decades ago are coming back into style again.

Then the kids pinned a new label on me one day not long ago, when they couldn't find anything or anyone else to pester as vacation is becoming boring.

"Mom, you're an oldie but a goodie." "Old, old, old... over the hill."

While they might label me old, they'd just best not forget that I'm still fast enough to catch them with a gentle reminder about who's still boss.

Charcoal fire starting tips

LANCASTER — Charcoal is popular for outdoor cooking. However, there are drawbacks, says Dennis J. Murphy, Extension safety specialist, The Pennsylvania State University.

Starting charcoal can be troublesome and the burning time required may cause hungry people to become impatient.

Charcoal lighter fluid is convenient and easy to use. Do not use fuel oil, kerosene, or gasoline, cautions Murphy. They are not only dangerous, but they may produce a smoke that gives an oily taste to the food.

To start charcoal with lighter fluid, heap the amount of charcoal needed in the firebox and spray it thoroughly with the fluid. Give the fluid two or three minutes to saturate the charcoal, then light it.

Let it burn about 20-25 minutes before starting to cook. With good quality charcoal you will not see any flame, just a grey ash that shows up around the edges of the charcoal pieces. When the charcoal is about two-thirds covered with this grey ash, it is hot enough for cooking.

Treat charcoal with caution. Don't let the absence of flame fool you. The grey ash hides a very hot fire and should be handled with tongs. Even a tiny fleck or two of the ash is enough to cause a serious burn, reminds Murphy.
