Retailing ideas increase pork's convenience

LANCASTER — New ways of packaging and merchandising pork in your supermarket's meat department mean increased convenience, variety and possible savings for the consumer.

Until recently, there was a lack of new techniques in retailing pork, says University of Delaware extension home economist Sally Foulke. Now, several ideas are gaining popularity with consumers and the trade.

Fresh ground pork is one new product being sold in some parts of the country and its availability is expanding, she says. Ground pork, unlike sausage, has no added seasonings and is 70 to 80 percent lean.

It wasn't until February of this year that a full-scale test of the product was made in a major metropolitan market. Denver consumers reacted favorably and indicated the concept is a viable marketing opportunity for pork. With over 50 percent of all beef marketed in ground form, the potential tonnage for ground pork products could be awesome.

Another major development that could ultimately affect how customers buy pork is vacuum packing. Closely trimmed, boneless pork cuts are sealed in plastic after the air has been driven out of the package.

"Vacuum packaging gives the consumer a fresher product with a longer shelf life. And the products are packed under very careful quality control," says Foulke.

Consumers may notice a difference in the color of vacuum-packed pork, she notes. "Because there's no oxygen present in the package, the color becomes more of a dull purple rather than the bright pink people are used to. But when the package is opened and oxygen contacts the meat, the bloom returns."

Vacuum-packed, boneless cuts are easy to prepare. Many companies provide recipe ideas right on the package. And, boneless cuts are easy to carve and serve. There's no waste because the products have so little fat and no bones, so every bit of the meat is usable.

"Now we're seeing larger cuts, such as a whole picnic ham or half a loin, in vacuum packaging. In the future, I think we'll see individual cuts, such as pork chops and pork blade steaks, done this way," Foulke says. A process for vacuum packaging such cuts is still in the experimental stage.
