mares to be imported and treatment from countries affected with contagious equine metritis, a venereal disease of horses, but only under strict testing procedures.

John K. Atwell, deputy administrator of USDA's Animal and Plant Health Inspection

Service, said no breeding age mares have been permitted to be imported from these countries since the disease was discovered in 1977.

"The new import requirements include intensive testing and treatment procedures to assure that mares are free of the disease," Atwell said.

A key element is the surgical removal of the clitoral sinuses from the mares. Contagious equine metritis bacteria are most likely to remain in the clitoral sinuses after clinical signs of the disease have disappeared, he said. These tissues are also the most difficult to test and treat.

Under the new rules, government veterinarians in the country of origin must collect a test specimen immediately before surgery. Both the test specimens and the excised tissues will then be cultured for bacteria.

After surgery, the mare would have five days of intensive treatment. Then the mare must pass three negative tests for contagious equine metritis at intervals of at least seven days. The final tests must be taken no more than 30 days before she is exported to the United States.

If any of these tests showed infection, the mares could not be shipped, Atwell said.

At the port-of-entry quarantine in the United States the mares will be checked for dourine, glanders, equine piroplasmiasis and equine infectious anemia. They will then be consigned for contagious equine metritis treatment and testing in a state that has agreed to accept mares from affected countries under state and federal laws to prevent the disease.

Post-entry treatment and testing include five days of treatment, followed by a series of three tests at intervals of not less than seven days. Mares passing all of these procedures with negative results will be released from quarantine.

Pregnant mares must remain in quarantine until they foal. Both mare and foal must pass negative tests for contagious equine metritis. All work in the country of origin must be supervised by the government's veterinarians, and diagnostic testing must be in laboratories approved by those governments.

Contagious equine metritis is a venereal disease of horses that directly infects only the mares. Stallions may be mechanical carriers of the bacteria; however, they may be rendered free of the disease by thorough scrubbing and treatment of their genitalia.

Countries listed by USDA as affected with the disease are Australia, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Federal Republic of Germany, France, Ireland, Italy, Japan and the United Kingdom.

Text of the new regulation was published in the Oct. 16 Federal Register.

Hunters should make presence known

HARRISBURG — Last year there were 16 persons shot in mistake for game in Pennsylvania, one less than the preceding year. A number of precautions which could be taken by potential victims might help reduce their chances of being involved in a mishap.

Should a hunter know that another person is in the vicinity, the hunter hopefully will be a little more cautious, just a little more hesitant to shoot, probably a little more concerned that another hunter is not in the line of fire.

A hunter might make his or her presence known with a friendly, spoken greeting. Perhaps a discreet cough might do the trick. Or possibly a noisy exchange might be necessary.

This might deprive another hunter a shot at a piece of game, but it is much better for a hunter to be upset about missing a turkey, say, than to find a gunshot victim. In any event, there should be some communication.

A rustle in the leaves or brush cannot be recommended to let another hunter know about one's presence, since game can normally be expected to make a similar noise, too.

While the shooter always bears the burden of making absolutely sure of his or her target before firing, hunters who take some sensible precautions can avoid becoming likely targets for overly-anxious shooters.
