

Leading

Seek novel strategies for marketing, including vigorous individual and collective advertising through the public media. Commodity availability from unusual sources such as farm markets, pick-your-own, and community outlets should be emphasized.

Develop crop varieties and accompanying cultural technology that will maximize productivity and extend the market season. There have been remarkable achievements with strawberries for year-around production in specific locations. Great progress has also been made with apples. Similar efforts should be extended to other crops.

Continue the expansion and use of resource-sparing technologies such as drip irrigation, conservation tillage, direct seeding, and allelopathic responses.

Design optimal strategies for crop diversification to spread labor, utilize resources and extend the cash flow. Identify the combinations of commodities and production patterns that will most effectively utilize the available labor and optimize income.

Improve the attractiveness of on-the-farm sales and pick-your-own operations. Seek the advantage of increasing consumer interest in the purchase of fresh fruits and vegetables as to tolerances of blemishes. Determine multiple uses of the same commodity for customers, superior structures for laying out pick-your-own operations.

Improve social dimensions of small scale horticultural enterprises. Seek better methods of dealing with migrants and a resolution of their social and economic limitations and problems.

Look to other agriculturally developed and developing nations in Western Europe and the Far East (Japan, Taiwan, People's Republic of China) for new and possibly more appropriate technologies for intensified agriculture and small-scale enterprises. These technologies could include those associated with mechanization, crop varieties, waste and by-product utilization, green manuring and crop rotation, and methods of integrated pest management.
