

Processing deer in meat plants is O.K.

HARRISBURG — Meat plants are not prohibited from processing deer, despite rumors to the contrary.

The Game Commission says that both state and federal meat inspection regulations specifically do not prohibit plants from processing game for hunters. When processing meat products, venison and meat from other game can be mixed with beef, pork or other domestic meat, if desired. Game cannot be bought or sold.

Meat processors are governed by stringent federal and state inspection regulations, and may refuse to process deer because of hardships and by these regulations.

Choosing a smoke detector

LANCASTER — Fire kills over 12,000 Americans every year. The tragedy is that at least half these deaths could have been prevented with smoke detectors, says Dennis Murphy, Penn State Extension Safety Specialist.

For those in search of the proper early warning system, Murphy answers these common questions:

What is the difference between smoke detectors and heat detectors and which is better?

As the names indicate, smoke detectors sound an alarm when they are activated by smoke and heat detectors are activated by heat. For a heat detector to be effective, it must be near the location of the fire. This means several units must be installed to cover all areas of the house.

However, a smoke detector can be activated by smoke coming from a remote area of the house. Studies also show that smoke detectors respond to a wider range of home fires. So it is more economical and effective to go with a smoke detector.

What are the different types of smoke detectors? Ionization and photoelectric smoke detectors. The photoelectric smoke detectors. The photoelectric smoke detector contains a small light source and a photocell. When smoke enters the detector, light reflects the smoke particles into the photocell and the alarm sounds.

The ionization smoke alarm contains a small radiation source that produces electrically charged air molecules called ions. These ions allow a small electric current to flow in the chamber. When smoke particles attach to the ions, they reduce the flow of electric current, setting off the alarm.

Both types of smoke alarms are effective, but the photoelectric alarm senses a smoldering fire quicker while an ionization alarm responds to a flaming fire faster. Many new smoke alarms have both the photoelectric and ionization features.

Isn't the source of radiation in an ionization smoke alarm dangerous?

According to the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, it is not dangerous. The NRC makes sure all detectors meet safety requirements.

The radiation source contains a small amount of americium 241, a carcinogen (cancer-causing agent); but it does not emit americium. The only way the substance could affect you is if it vaporized by heat near the temperature of molten silver. But if you're in a fire that severe, you probably won't be worrying about inhaling such a tiny amount of americium.

Where should I install the smoke detector?

The basic system should consist of one smoke detector outside of each sleeping area and an additional detector for every other level of the house, including the basement and excluding unfinished attics and crawl spaces.

If the hallway between the living and sleeping areas is more than 40 feet, you will need a smoke detector at both ends of the hall.

How should I mount a smoke detector?

Mount detectors on the ceiling, at least 18 inches away from walls and corners. Corners are dead air spaces.

Although instructions for some detectors say the alarm also can be placed on the wall, the ceiling is the preferred location.
