family goat. Megan, however, proved to be proficient with just one hand since the other was occupied with her baby doll.

Sarah Ellen Stanley, according to her mother Rosalind, would much rather work than play with toys. Consequently, she was caught in the act of scrubbing down the milking parlor while helping her dad Mark. The Stanleys have since moved from the dairy and now operate a vegetable farm near Mt. Airy, Maryland. But Sarah, 3, wasn't dismayed, explains her mother. She now hoes instead of milks.

At 8-years-old, Howard Hurline is still one year away from joining 4-H. But the son of Patricia and Melvin Hurline keeps busy on the family Holstein dairy. His mother captured the moment between boy and beasts as Howard brought the cows up for milking. In addition, the Baldwin, Maryland youth helps his mom with her registered Montadale sheep flock.

Dawn and Dave Windle of Atglen get a little extra help each time their nephew Jeremy visits.

Jeremy Nickodenski, 4, provides some helpful energy each time he visits his aunt and uncle Dawn and Dave Windle of Atglen. Jeremy's favorite chore, explains Dawn, is helping to feed, which she captured with a 110 pocket instamatic.

Jeremy's favorite job, explains Aunt Dawn, is helping Uncle Dave feed the cows.

Finally, we received entries of tired little farmers at the end of a long day. And it seemed that no place was too uncomfortable for the hard-working tykes. The future farmers slumbered in tent flaps, next to cows and even leaned against walls.

Melissa Wolgemuth snoozed in a soft straw bed while her parents

Susan and Jeff finished the evening milking. Although the 3-year-old York County youth has no set chores, her dad explains that the barn is her favorite place because it contains her tricycle and plenty of cats.

We hope you've enjoyed a look at agriculture's diminutive workforce. Watch future issues for our Dairy Photo Album, made possible by those who shared a little of their dairy life with us.
