THINKING ABOUT MONEY?

Is money the root of all evil or the pathway to heaven? Your attitudes toward money make a big difference in your ability to make rational financial decisions. Actually money is simply an exchange of effort or work for an ability to buy goods and services. There is nothing basically good or bad about it.

Nevertheless, many people have complicated, often conflicting patterns of using or managing money that interfere with their ability to plan realistically.

The first step toward balanced money management is to identify your attitudes toward it. If you let others make your financial decisions or if you are to keep track of where your money went, then it's time you developed a sensible money management system. Here is a list of money management skills you need to develop to manage your money effectively:

Identify your feelings about money.

Take responsibility of your own financial affairs and talk about your financial situation with your

Set goals for yourself as well as for your family.

Know your current financial situation, what your assets and liabilities are for yourself and your family.

Establish a credit record, and be sure to keep it in good standing.

Develop a good planning system, including keeping track of your current income and spending, your use of credit, and establishing controls to help you keep to your financial goals.

Have some financial assets in your own name - all adults should.
