Ladies Have You Heard?

Is A Food Processor For You?
When electric food processors first came on the scene a half dozen years ago, they had price tags of several hundred dollars. Now they are available in a variety of price ranges, and many consumers are considering adding a food processor to their kitchen arsenal. How do you decide if a food processor is right for you?

The best way to decide is to look closely at what food processors will and won't do. If the food processor performs many chores that you now do frequently by hand, you may well find the appliance both a convenience and a time saver. If, on the other hand, the food processor does not perform mealtime tasks you do frequently, another more appropriate appliance or a hand tool may better fill your needs.

What does a food processor do? It will grate or shred cheese, slice vegetables uniformly, chop or mince nuts, grind meat, make pastry and knead dough. It will also puree any mixture, and make smooth or chunky nut butters.

A food processor will not be effective for whipping cream or beating egg whites and, while most processors do an excellent job of kneading bread doughs, all but the largest can handle only about one pound at a time.

If you are considering the purchase of a food processor, look at your cooking habits in relation to the tasks that food processors do and shop around. You'll find wide variations in price and performance. Above all, read the use and care instructions carefully, before you plug in your new tool.

Food Stores Adding Financial Service Centers
Soon you may walk into a supermarket and buy a pound of money...well, not really. But you may be able to buy a mutual fund. More and more supermarkets appear interested in adding financial services to their traditional fare. These services include automobile and home insurance, money market funds and IRA accounts.

For the most part these ideas are just in the planning stages, but there's one new development that's steady in place in a number of stores, the electronic fund transfer system. This system uses a plastic, magnetic card, similar to a credit card, to automatically transfer money from the customer's bank account to the store's account. Industry specialists say this system will reduce time spent in the check-out line because the entire transaction takes only 7 seconds.

Proponents of the automatic transfer system say it should reduce operating costs by cutting down on the number of bad checks and the cost of handling checks. An experimental program taking place this summer in Reading will determine if the system can reduce food stamp fraud. Rather than deduct money from a person's account, the card will be used to deduct food stamps.

The disadvantage with the system is there's no "float time." That's when you buy groceries after the banks have closed intending to deposit money first thing in the morning to cover the check. Another drawback is you no longer get the traditional proof of purchase which is your cancelled check.

Still the new system is expected to reduce operating costs, and that will benefit everyone.
