registered "American Nubian" or whatever respective breed, and a buck can be registered "American" after four generations. Anne says that this fall they will be milking over 40 does including much of her own breeding stock.

"My kids really got to be a good size this year," she adds. The animals are fed a dairy cow ration formulated through Penn State. Anne says that the bucks have been putting good size and milk production potential in their offspring. No additives are fed or used at all, Anne says proudly, adding that she and Ralph attend many seminars and meetings to keep up to date on modern practices with dairy goats.

Newborn animals are fed milk with buckets and any extra milk is fed to calves until they receive their certification. Anne says that Ralph and Stephanie are the biggest milk drinkers and hopes that when their dairy is in full operation, other people will come to appreciate their product.

"I like their affection and their size," Anne says of her animals. "They're cleaner, too," Sherry adds, comparing them to cows. Each goat knows her name and the girls demonstrated how the kids love to get out and jump around, never straying far from their owners. It's hard to tell who has more of the affection - the people for their goats, or the goats for their people.

Stephanie treats the goats to lettuce and carrots. Each goat has her own personality, says Stephanie, who enjoys their affection.
