Rural voice

APPLETON, Wisc. — "The voice of rural America must come in loud and clear on America's vital national issues," a U.S. Department of Agriculture official has said.

Willard "Bill" Phillips, Jr., director of the Office of Rural Development Policy, said to the Wisconsin Towns Association, "Rural America is affected by urban, national and international policies, and rural leaders must work their way into the national decision-making arena."

"Economics, environment, transportation, trade and education, as well as agricultural policies, affect the lives of rural citizens — at times even more quickly and strongly than the urban population," he said. "Your voice is vital in all these decisions, and we have already built the foundation for your voice to be heard."

Since 1980, USDA has been mandated to send an annual rural development policy statement to Congress. "In the last 3 years we have developed a process by which rural Americans play an important role in developing these policy statements; they are developed from the grassroots," Phillips said.
