KEEP FOOD PRESERVATION RECORDS

A convenient, yet often forgotten item of food preservation is a "notebook." A written record of specific information will make canning or freezing foods at home easier and provide you with an inventory of all the foods you have on hand throughout the year.

Your notebook or record system might be a file box, a notebook binder, or a partially used note pad. The idea is to keep all the information in one place where you can refer to it easily.

Here are some tips on information you will want to record about the foods you preserve:

- Varieties of fruits and vegetables,
- Amount planted, when planted, time from planting to harvesting,
- Yield (in jars) of amount planted or purchased,
- Amount canned or frozen and date (list by number of jars or packages),
- Quantity of food to fill one canner load,
- Specific notes on processing—time to process one canner load, or blanching and packaging for freezing,
- Time needed to cool pressure canner for specific foods,
- Heat settings on range to maintain proper pressure or rolling boil,
- Favorite recipes.

In addition to having helpful tips on food preservation in an easy-to-find place from year to year, you will find it easier to "rotate" your food supply using oldest foods first, without having to count actual jars or packages. It will also be helpful when making up shopping lists throughout the year. And when someone asks you how much food you canned or froze—you can efficiently report your efforts with the aid of a record book.

BUYING LOWER FOOD

GRADES CAN SAVE MONEY

Do you understand United States government food grades? You can shop more economically if you do.

Depending on how you plan to use a product, a lower grade may not only meet your needs, but be cheaper as well.

When establishing grades, the USDA considers the product qualities wholesale buyers and sellers look for. Because products with the better grade characteristics bring higher prices, retail food buyers specify certain grades when they place orders. However, consumers do not always see the gradings. Grade labeling is not required by law.

You are most likely to see USDA grades on meats, eggs and butter. However, some fresh produce such as apples and potatoes also are graded, as are certain cheeses and preserves. Grades usually reflect the product's color, shape, maturity and freedom from defects.

For example, USDA Prime beef is the top grade for tenderness and flavor. Prime is best for broiling and roasting because of the meat's marbled texture, but it's rarely available outside major market areas. Although marbling, the flecks of fat within the lean that make meat juicy, is more prevalent in Prime and Choice than USDA Good, the latter grade will cost less and can often meet your needs. This lower grade, usually sold under a house name, will become tender after slow, moist cooking.

Top grade products have the high quality appearance and texture that is important for use in specialty meals and dishes. If sunny-side up is the style of the morning, Grade AA or A eggs are especially attractive. But lower grade products are just as wholesome and nutritious. If appearance isn't important, buy Grade B. They sell for less.
