Plant Birka Barley this spring... The profitable alternative to oats.

Many growers are convinced — and comparison tests prove them right — that spring barley is the sensible alternative to oats especially when it's the new Birka Barley. Birka outperforms oats in yield and test weight, and has excellent standability. It has been the top New York grown barley in Cornell trials for three years in a row, and provides the dependability that oats often does not.

For The Dairyman — Birka Barley is more than a good nurse crop, so often the primary function of oats. Birka is an excellent dairy feed — higher in energy and TDN than oats, comparable in protein and palatability, and excellent for standability — even when extra nitrogen is used. Birka fits well into a summer feeding and cropping program because it is ready for combining far ahead of corn harvest.

For The Cash Cropper — Birka has more advantages than its high yield, test weight, and excellent resistance to lodging. Two-rowed Birka is a good harvester. Its plump kernels head out well and do not fall to the ground before combining. There is generally an immediate favorable price market for barley unlike oats, which may have to be stored to await best price, and barley fills that long period before corn harvest. Also, Birka's stiff, sturdy straw makes it a good seller at the race tracks and other profitable markets.

Birka Barley is sold as certified seed only. Look for the Blue Tag.
