On being a farm wife
- And other hazards
Joyce Bupp

After 20-plus years of marriage, a wife can usually take one glance at hubby's face and know instantly if something is very wrong.

And the face above the body that had come bursting through the front door told me indeed that something had gone way out of whack this late evening hour.

"We have heifers ALL OVER the place."

Oh, groan.
Combine the elements of a hectic day of hauling manure, evening milking visit by the DHIA tester, and broken feed cart that needed repair before the herd could be fed. Blend with that about 70 yearling and bred heifers whose pasture is drying up, and who hadn't yet had their bunk feeders supper - due to feed cart repairs underway.

Then, top off that combination with a gate accidentally left open.

Just call it a foolproof recipe for farmstead disaster.

Heifers. Everywhere. The lower yard. The upper yard. Up the road - down the road - and rattling doors, dumping feed and snitching hay out in the calf nursery.

Our standard battle attack plan goes into instant action.

One chaser takes off on the three-wheeler in one direction. Another heads in the other direction on the cycle. And the other putts off on - don't ask me why - a bicycle. Which leaves yours truly to protect the farmstead area. I snag a small piece of maple branch and hold forth to six cats my opinions of heifer breakouts after dark.

In moments, the shuffling of hooves sounds from the paved road running past the house and black and white blotches form a shadowy flow in the glow of the porch light.

The ludicrousness of this bovine stampede under sparkling stars and dying sliver of moon - for some inane reason - strikes me funny. I stand in the blue glow of the night light in my powder blue jogging suit (looking no doubt like a Smurf) and laugh out loud. Any bystander would figure I've flipped my marbles.

Chasing heifers does funny things to people.

With the wheeled roundup trio at their heels, the bulk of the heifers come from three directions through the yard. Wielding my trusty maple-twig baton, I direct the troublemakers through the yard gate and into the dairy barn. To get in a last lick, several snatch bites of my daylilies as they pass by.

Now to corral the stragglers - number and location unknown. The wheeled trio again departs. Lights grow smaller as vehicles head for distant points of the farm.

"You keep the heifers from coming back out of the barn," had been my assignment.

Sure, Lesse. Some 50 heifers averaging maybe 800 pounds. Hey people - that's 20 tons of heifers. Come back. Don't leave me here alone.

Minutes pass. The barn is quiet. A cat chews on the end of my trusty twig armament. More minutes pass. Darkness over the horizon and peace over the farmstead. The phrase "calm before the storm" runs through my mind.

Then the sound of hooves swishing through the hayfield, the roar of motors, lights sweeping the field above the house, and suddenly, black and white bodies explode around the edge of the yard fence. My twig and I do our thing, and the cats scatter. Peace is restored. And the only thing moving in the darkness is the twinkling of the stars.

Twinkling? Probably more like giggling.
