

Warner Crop. Observes Golden Anniversary

WARSAW, Ind. — The Warner Corporation of North Manchester, Indiana, a well-known supplier of Flex-Flo automatic feed systems and other livestock feeding equipment, is observing its 50th anniversary.

Founded as the Warner Brooder Company in 1936 by Boyd Warner, The Warner Corporation originally used its North Manchester storefront to produce brooder stoves for the poultry industry. The Warner product line gradually expanded to include a variety of poultry and swine feeding equipment and, in 1941, the Corporation moved to its present two-story, 96,000-square-foot building at 802 West Main Street in North Manchester.

Today Warner provides a wide selection of swine equipment, automatic feed delivery systems for swine and dairy operations, and cross-auger delivery systems for poultry feeding and grain handling applications. In addition, Warner handles a line of fireplace accessory items for home use.

Booklet Details Round Bale Silage

NEW HOLLAND — Round bale silage is catching on as a supplement to other forage harvesting methods. A new book on methods used by farmers across the U.S. and Canada is available free from New Holland Inc., New Holland, PA, 17557.

Some producers use round bale silage when rainy weather interferes with hay making. Some use it for the late fall cuttings when hay is hard to cure and tower silos are already full. A few dairymen are reported to be using round bale silage for their highest producers and feeding haylage from the tower silos for the rest of the herd. Properly made, it's a high-quality feed.

Slurry Spreaders Spread More Than Manure

North Carolina poultryman, Darrell Wright, saves labor by using his side-delivery slurry spreader to place clean shavings in a 400-foot broiler house. Driving down the middle of the house, he spreads one side, then turns around and spreads the other side on the return trip. Dairymen can also use their spreaders to place shavings in dairy loafing sheds.
