On being a farm wife - And other hazards
Joyce Bupp

Such an innocent looking appliance.

There it sits in bride-like white, it's face textured with tiny creases (not supposed to show fingerprints) and ornamented with cow and pig magnets, cartoons, philosophical clippings and a supermarket list affixed to the spot where its ear would be if it were a person.

But a reproduction roadside sign, "Garbage Dump," front and center, is closer to the truth.

Our household bulletin board, alias a refrigerator, harbors awful secrets within.

What's left after a week of cattle showing, come-and-go-eating and absence of replenishment food marketing trips, is truly the dregs of kitchen cuisine.

Like this one-and-a-quarter inch tail end chunk of homemade bologna. Originally, it came as part of a somewhat larger chunk that had been forgotten in the ancient barn refrigerator. Buried behind a supply of bovine twisted stomach treatment and post milk fever pick-me-up — or whatever all that stuff out there is for — it was already in the first stages of petrification when I found it.

Of course, homemade bologna is indestructible. No doubt you could patch tires with a slice of the durable stuff in a pinch. If you could slice it at all.

Gradually the chew-bone-like food was nibbled away to this last ignored chunk. I considered the dog. But we all love him too much to let him rip his molars away on such an offering. And it's unlikely the cats' teeth have adequate penetrating power.

Perhaps just a simple, proper burial would be in order. Let some underground mouse self-destruct his chops when he tries to chomp the stuff. One less to munch my tulip bulbs.

The orangish-puddle flooding under the meat and veggie drawers seems to be originating from a half cantaloupe turned upside down on a shelf. It was donated to a resident kid by a friend — and I think I know why.

At least the thing could have the decency to show its face like a man, and not limply cower there leaking into infinity.

Three plastic bread bags, each with exactly two ancient crusts inside, do battle for space with a half-full box of macaroni. Uncooked pasta in the fridge has become commonplace here, especially in the fall. This household maintains a distinct prejudice against little creepy creatures which thrive in pasta products when summer heat suffocates kitchen cupboard contents.

Covered bins of refrigerators seem especially prone to food hide-n-seek problems. We may have the first pair of dehydrated oranges in history. Plus, the unmistakable aroma of a rapidly aging chunk of summer cabbage adds its own aura to the "Garbage Dump" overall effect.

However, if the container of pureed pumpkin, thawed many moons ago and then detoured from the intent of breadmaking, isn't removed, along with its growth of a green forest-like coating, we may have to install a new refrigerator label.

Anyone know where I can lay my hands on a "Toxic Waste" sign?
