Prevent Outbreaks Of Bovine Tuberculosis

UNIVERSITY PARK (Centre Co.) — Tuberculosis occurs in every country in the world and in all species of animals, including man. Infected animals are the main source of infection. Other species of farm animals, wild animals and pets can transmit this contagious disease.

Bacteria, Mycobacteria bovis most commonly in cattle, is excreted into the environment through feces, urine, milk, and discharges from the nose, vagina and the uterus. The bacteria can be passed to other animals from a shared water source, feed bunk or being in close quarters with an infected animal. Drinking infected milk is one of the most common ways for tuberculosis to be transmitted to youngstock.

Currently, transmission from cattle to man is not common but still is possible just by working around infected cattle. Infection can also occur when infected, unpasteurized milk is consumed. Should TB be found in your herd, all hired hands and family member should be tested.

Tuberculosis can be prevented only if animals are not exposed to disease-causing bacteria.

Have animals tested annually, know the health status of your herd.
