

Supreme Title To Angus

"When I started showing that's what I showed and I am comfortable with the breed. I don't know much about the other breeds," she said.

Calderazzo's show animals also took reserve grand champion bull and placed in some other class competitions.

The creation of supreme title was applauded by all exhibitors. However, some in the competition said they didn't feel it was correct to have judged bulls against females to determine supreme. They said that, similar to announcing a king and queen, the sexes should be judged separately; especially since the animals are chosen for breeding qualities.

"I feel they should have two supremes; a supreme male and a female," said Mike Clark of Maple Lane Farm in Lawrence County. "I don't see how you can pick the best animal out of two sexes."

"I feel the same way," added Ed Nicol, also of Maple Lane Farm. "But I do think it's a good thing that they put it in the show."

Maple Lane Farm's top-judged entry, a heifer Limousin was knocked down with eight other cattle during supreme judging.

"I'm not disappointed. I would have liked to have it, but we still have the champion of the breed," Nicol said.

Calderazzo said she wasn't ready to take a stand one way or the other as to how judging ought to be done in the future. "It's a very big deal. I'd say it's just nice to have the supreme," she said.

Last year, Farm Show officials had returned to naming a supreme dairy cow, for the first time in more than a decade. The prize money accompanying that title was, and is, $1,000.

This year, officials extended supreme titles to swine, sheep, and beef cattle. The prize money accompanying these other titles is $250.

"I'll probably save it (the $250) for college. I want to major in fashion design," Calderazzo said.
