Report Sets Stage For Water Quality Progress

WASHINGTON, D.C.—The Council for Agricultural Science and Technology's (CAST) report titled "Water Quality: Agriculture's Role," is a balanced presentation about agriculture and the nation's water quality and provides a basis for diverse groups to come together and agree on policy measure to address current problems.

"This report should be read by all those on Capitol Hill who will be involved in the reauthorization of the Clean Water Act," said TFI President Gary D. Myers. "The report recognizes the complexity of water quality problems and that solutions must be local and site-specific and must address many factors."

The report, Myers said, properly demonstrates the strides made by agriculture in minimizing environmental impact. Farmers do have incentives and motivation to minimize the impact of their practices on the environment and will continue to improve as research and education adds to the knowledge base used by farmers.

There are two major omissions in the report. The chapter entitled "Risk/Benefit Considerations" contains no discussion of the benefits from agriculture.

Also, policy prescriptions for changing farmer behavior focus on the relationship of government to farmers, leaving out the agricultural retailer who is the most important source of agronomic information to farmers.

"The fertilizer industry has played an important role in educating farmers about the safe and efficient use of nutrients. It is only through the continuation of this partnership that farmers will be given continued access to high technology solutions to today's water quality problems," said Myers.

Still, said Myers, the report forms the basis for diverse interests to agree on the nature and extent of the water quality problem so that proper solutions can also be discussed.
