Finisher Combines Secondary Tillage In Single Pass

RACINE, Wis. — The new Case International 4200 Combo-Mulch Finisher combines secondary tillage needs in a single pass, cutting time and reducing soil compaction as well as fuel and labor expenses.

The 4200 comes in six sizes from 11 feet 10 inches to 34 feet 1 inch. It is available in six configurations — two rigid and four folding. All models transport at 15 feet 11 inches or less, one of the narrowest transport widths on combination secondary tillage machines in the industry, according to Kurt Schenck, Case product manager-implements.

Regardless of size, the 4200 features a minimum 40-inch "settling zone" between the disc gang and the first cultivator rank that allows the soil to settle before herbicide application and eliminates the need for shields at recommended operating speeds.

The basic machine consists of one row of disc blades with a four-rank field cultivator. Massive mainframe components of welded rectangular tubing allow the 4200 to withstand the faster working speeds customary with today's high-horsepower tractors.

Mechanical depth control of the gangs is easily adjusted from 2 inches below to 5.5 inches above the sweep point. This gives operators the option of raising gangs to control the retention of surface residue or to use the 4200 as a field cultivator, an option, Schenck noted, that is not often offered by other manufacturers.

Pre-assembled, spring-cushioned gangs are set at 10-degree angles and work in conjunction with the 20-inch Earth Metal® crimped-center disc blades for aggressive cutting action to create a smoother seedbed. The spring-cushion assembly on each gang prolongs the life of the entire gang by "springing" over obstacles in the field. Independent spring-cushioning gives customers the option of installing hydraulic depth control without affecting the machine's cushioning ability.

The exclusive shank design on the 4200 Combo-Mulch Finisher gives it the ability to tackle heavy-residue conditions. Case International Vibra Shank® cultivator shanks are arranged in a four-bar ranking on three-bar spacing to provide 20.1-inch residue clearance between each cultivator shank on each rank. A 22-inch vertical shank clearance provides easy handling of cornstalks and other heavy residue.

Shank spacing is set at 6.7 inches with 7.5-inch sweeps for optimum soil preparation and chemical incorporation. The 4200 has more shanks than competitive units — from 21 on the smallest model to 61 on the largest — to ensure soil is fully cut and thoroughly mixed across the width of the machine.

The standard self-leveling hitch assures consistent depth control from the front to the rear of the 4200 and is adjusted with the hand crank provided. Walking beam axles that promote even stirring depth are also standard on the main frames and wings of all models except the 4221, which is equipped with single-axle wing wheels.

Six leveling attachments are available for the 4200 Combo-Mulcher Finisher: three-bar adjustable coil tine harrow, five-bar adjustable spike harrow, single-bar peg harrow, double rolling basket, Bervac harrow and Fuerst harrow. The unit can be ordered without a leveling attachment so it can be retrofitted regionally.

As the name implies, the Case International 4200 Combo-Mulch Finisher combines mulching and finishing into one operation to provide significant savings in time, fuel, and labor. It comes in six sizes and six configurations, all of which transport at 15 feet 11 inches or less.
