instruction to the needs of the dairy farmers who have attended. To date, 400 dairy farmers have taken the course, and from their experience, the course material has been revised and expanded to fill the needs of almost any dairy farmer in

Rather than lecture, the presenters or facilitators of Dairy MAP courses use examples of dairy farm operations for the attendees to match with their own operations.

The farmers write their buildess and personal objectives and formulate goals that are specific, monuterable, attainable, relevant and aimely. Topics cover planning, controls, staffing, directing, and organizing. A lot of the educational process comes from the interchange among the dairy farmors in the workshop.

Many farmers going into the classes thought they were good managers but found that there were many things they could do better after they became aware of different possibilities. Decisionmaking, based on objective rather than subjective assumptions, was one of the great benefits cited by farmers who had taken the course.

The ad hoc committee decided to support the Dairy-MAP program as the method to help dairy farmers with management skills. An advisory committee of halfindustry people and half-producers was formed to work with Penn State personnel to further adapt the course to farmer's needs, hire persons to run the program, and promote the program to farmers with the support of the dairy industry stakeholders. A finance committee was also formed to raise funds to run the program.

All this effort comes from a real concern that the business climate for dairy farming in Pennsylvania has become and may continue to be of such a nature that the industry might not survive the economic pressures. If dairy farmers can't make a living, Pennsylvania's total agriculture industry is in trouble. And the supporting jobs that make up 20 percent of Pennsylvania's economy are also in jeopardy.
