

Manure Composting Demonstrations Set

ROCKSPRING (Centre Co.)— Many farmers adopting nutrient management plans are finding they have excess manure, and it can be cumbersome and costly to deal with. An alternative is composting. Learn about materials and techniques for composting at Penn State's 1994 Ag Progress Days, August 16 to 18.

"Farmers often get complaints from suburban neighbors about manure handling and disposal," says Robert Oberheim, Ag Progress Days manager in Penn State's College of Agricultural Sciences. "Composting manure can be the answer to odor and pollution problems as well as a way to deal with excess manure."

Farmers interested in composting manure and other agricultural wastes can visit the on-farm composting display above West Twelfth Street, past the horse area. Wagons leaving every half hour from the Conservation Education

Tent will shuttle visitors to the display.

Featured will be concrete manure bunkers, compost turners and a manure composting pad. "The concrete composting pad is an example of what is approved by the Pennsylvania SCS and the Pennsylvania Department of Environmental Resources," says Oberheim.

The compost turners will handle a variety of materials, such as food processing waste, animal manure, leaves and grass clippings. Experts will be on hand to explain compost mixtures and procedures.

"In addition to showing large, commercial-sized compost turners, we hope to display equipment suitable for smaller farms," says Oberheim. "Displays will show how manure composts when mixed with different kinds of animal bedding."
