MANHEIM (Lancaster Co.) —
In the classroom at Manheim Central High School, students are gaining a new appreciation for farmers.

It's an attitude that is long past due and one that seems to be dwindling nationwide as the population becomes farther and farther removed from the tillers of the soil.

As city limits stretch into suburbs and enroaching farmland, residents are prone to hold their noses at chicken house odors and complain about pesticide and insecticide use.

That's because too many citizens don't know where their food comes from and the purposes behind those smells.

But Manheim students are different from the average scholar because the school's administrative personnel and board recognize the importance of agriculture in today's society. The administration wants the students to evaluate the impact of agriculture on society and how the students are connected to agriculture.

Every ninth-grader at the school is required to take a nine week
