

Poultry Pointers

shown that the number of Salmonella-positive layer flocks can be significantly reduced.

Such techniques can be successful and can produce a safer food for consumers. However, these programs must be developed on sound principles that are practical and effective. Most "preharvest" or growout HACCP programs will be based on best management practices (BMPs) combined with record keeping.

Research efforts are continuing in areas where the intestinal tracts of chicks and poults are colonized with good microorganisms to prevent the infection later with pathogenic bacteria. This research method is called "competitive exclusion" or CE. Other research shows that housing environments can be modified to make them not favorable for the growth and proliferation of harmful bacteria. When verified as effective, these new management tools will promote environments that are healthier for the bird as well as produce microbiologically safer poultry products.
