

New Penn State Major Explores Environmental Economics

UNIVERSITY PARK (Centre Co.)—What does it cost to preserve a species of owl? How much money could a company save by using a cleaner manufacturing process? And how much will it cost a company to comply with new environmental rules?

A new major in Penn State's College of Agricultural Sciences will prepare students to answer these types of questions by using economics to analyze environmental problems and their possible solutions.

The Environmental and Renewable Resources Economics (ERRE) major will serve an important educational need while addressing issues that students are very concerned about.

The major's core courses will apply economic theory to current issues in environmental policy, natural resource use, legal aspects of resource management and environmental management.

Basic courses in the program provide mathematics, communication and reasoning skills, as well as a strong background in the physical and biological sciences.

For more information about ERRE, write to the Department of Agriculture Economics and Rural Sociology, 103 Armsby Building, University Park, PA 16802, or call (814) 863-3536.
