CFS Expands Hybrid Research

MOMENCE, Ill. — As part of its continuing research expansion, Custom Farm Seed has moved its Northern Research Office to a newly acquired farm site near its Momence, Ill., headquarters. At this site early-season corn hybrid research will be expanded. Staff numbers have more than doubled in recent years.

During the '95 growing year, this 60-acre farm just south of Momence will be used for the breeding and testing of early and early mid-season corn hybrids. The 5,000-square-foot building on the farm will be used for additional office space, lab space, cold storage, and a shop. An irrigation system for the new station insures that key breeding projects are not interrupted due to drought.

"As larger companies have scaled back their research efforts, we've expanded and developed an extremely talented research staff," said J. Brent McKee, president, Custom Farm Seed. "From such a talented group, we look forward to the introductions of additional superior product."

"Adding the farm is part of our overall effort to expand our breeding and testing work so we can bring along new hybrids faster," he said. "The work being done is very important to corn growers in the northern Corn Belt, in Canada, Europe and for many contract growers of waxy corn."
