Now that winter is here, I spend most of my time indoors simply looking outdoors. The birds at the feeder are always interesting. It seems that the pecking order is blue jays first, followed by cardinals, and then the smaller birds.

One animal that gets my attention day after day is a red fox that hunts in our meadow. With the binoculars, one can see how his coat glistens and also how very black his legs are. He makes two trips through the woods and then sits in the open area listening for voles or mice. Sometimes I see him pounce but most of the time he heads up the hill to his home hungry.

Indoors my attention is often on my blooming impatiens. One crimson plant has one hundred flowers at one time. And, nearby is a pink with dark pink edges that has some 50 blossoms. Even the white and red begonias are very pretty. Of course, they need to be tended in order to keep them blooming all winter.

I've found time to put a year's worth of photos in books. Would you believe that we received 73 pictures of one grandchild in ten months? The first child in a family has the most pictures taken of him. Some scrapbooks have been filled and a few magazines read.

Over Christmas both our car and our truck decided not to work. So, it was good that the family gathering was here as we were homebound. There were about 40 at our gathering and too much food was left over.
