

Coalition To Coordinate Positions For Trade, Harmonization

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Manufacturers of animal health products in North, South, and Central America are joining forces to impact the future of the global animal health products industry, according to the Animal Health Institute, which represents the industry in the United States.

The Animal Health Coalition for the Americas, unveiled recently, brings together trade associations that represent manufacturers of animal health products in the United States, Canada, and throughout South and Central America. The coalition will provide solidarity among makers of animal health products throughout the Americas on issues regarding the international availability of health care products.

"This coalition will network AHI with its counterparts to the North and South," said Alexander S. Mathews, AHI's president and CEO. "It will provide the industry with a collective voice to discuss global policies that impact us."

AHI said the coalition, which will take an active role in discussions on global harmonization, will also impact producers and consumers of agricultural products
