IMLER (Bedford Co.) — Bedford County Dairy Herd Improvement Association held its annual awards banquet recently at the Imler Fire Hall, in Imler.

County Extension Agent Susan Fox presented awards.

Walking off with top honors for its herd management was Hidden Fox Farm, of Martinsburg, with a 50-cow herd.

The Steve and Jeri Ritchey farm, also in Martinsburg, was the second-place winner of the annual management award, which is based on a point system that includes, milk production, mastitis management and reproductive management.

The two farms also received the county's top two awards for highest average milk and protein production.

The Ritchey herd averagted 23,896 pounds of milk, and 774 pounds protein; while the Hidden Fox herd made an average of 23,425 pounds of milk, 740 pound-s of protein.

Recognized as the most improved in milk production, Rod and Cathy Carson, of Martinsburg, were honored for having an average increase in milk production of 1,771 pounds.

Their 50-cow herd's year-end average production was 21,025 pounds of milk.

Hidden Fox was named the second most improved herd, with an average milk increase of 1,478 pounds of milk.

As far as individual cow production, Meadow Creek Farm in Bedford was cited for having the most milk-producing cow, a 4-year-old; while Marlin Heisey, of Osterburg, had the second highest milkproducing cow.

The highest protein producing cow was also a 4-year-old, owned by Jack E. Colledge, of Everett, with 1,042 pounds, while the second highest protein producing cow was from Meadow Creek Farm, with 1,010 pounds protein.

In other business, Chris Kidd, of Everett, was elected for the first time to the county board of directors, while Joe Garman was reelected to a position on the board.

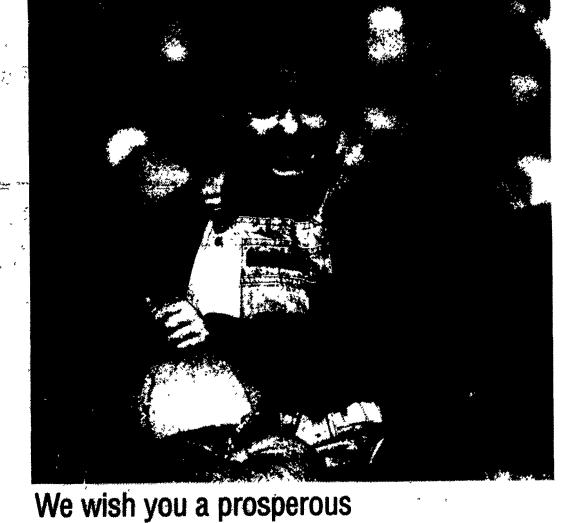

Also speaking during the event was Dick Ferry, a former artificial insemination technician from New Enterprise.

From the left, Chris Kidd is elected to the Bedford County DHIA board of directors, and stands with county Dairy Princess Becky Carson, and banquet speaker Dick Ferry.
