Making Milk With Less Saturated Fat

Palmquist said there are negatives to feeding for higher protein and higher unsaturated milk fat.

Consumer complaints may occur — unsaturated milk fat may develop an off-flavor taste in dairy products. Feeding whole soybeans may increase the polyunsaturated fat levels of milk fat by 60 to 100 percent, he said. "The polyunsaturated fat may become oxidized, giving the milk an oxidized flavor."

Palmquist is one of a number of researchers who have joined a regional research project to study how to change milkfat composition.

"There are several ongoing projects," he said. "Researchers from different areas of the country are working on the biochemistry of how the cow makes milk fat; others on cow feeding and the amounts and kinds of fats that produce the best end product; others are studying what effects modified milk fat composition will have on the quality of dairy products like cheese, yogurt and ice cream."

Palmquist said the dairy industry is also involved in the project — from feeding to milk quality to processing.

"The problem," he said, "is that milk comes from so many places and when a few farmers try something different, the results get lost in the masses."

Dairy Management Incorporated (DMI) located in Chicago, Ill., is one group now funding milkfat research.

"DMI has funded OARDC for a three-year study focusing on oxidized flavors and their connection to higher levels of polyunsaturated fat in milk," he said. "The regional project participants basically identify important questions and then use shared knowledge to develop coordinate research approaches."

Palmquist's role is to study the composition of milk. He's working on ways to feed fat to cows so that they function normally. He studies digestion in the rumen, factors that influence fat digestion, and quality of milk produced by feeding systems.

"It took us 20 years to develop Megalac," Palmquist said. And he feels it may take another 20 years to figure out the milk fat maze.

For now, Palmquist's advice is to tell people not to believe everything they read about nutrition.

"To be health-conscious, they shouldn't drop whole food groups from the menu. Someone with high cholesterol or other health issues should practice whatever habits are necessary to maintain health. Otherwise, adopting a balanced diet — including animal products — is the safest, healthiest and most enjoyable way to live."
