ANSWER — G. Sweitzer wanted infor-mation on converting gasoline engines to run on kerosene. Francis Tuoti, North Salem, N. Y. has lots of experience and would be happy to answer questions on the process. Call him at (914) 669-5020. Here is some of his information: Many old tractors in the 1920s were designed to run on both gasoline and kerosene. These were basically low-speed engines with low compression rations and long stroke relative to the cylinder bore or piston diameter. Most were started on gasoline (which vaporizes at lower tem-perature than kerosene and is therefore more combustible) and then switched to kerosene when the engine warmed up and was better able to vaporize the kero-sene. If you believe the compression should be lowered, try using two-head gaskets instead of one. Problems en-counterred: Exhaust emmissions may tend to be smokey and smelly, spark plug foul-ing from carbon buildup, decreased power, poor throttle response, poor cold weather starting unless started with gas-oline.
