Convention Panelist Says Farmers Must Make Individual Decisions On GMOs

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah-The nation's farmers ought to decide whether to plant seeds containing genetically modified organisms (GMOs) based on what's best for their farm operations rather than a perceived growing consumer demand for non-GMO farm products.

Allen Anderson, vice president of government affairs for St. Paul, Minn.-based Cenex Harvest States Cooperatives, delivered that message to the National Farmers Union's (NFU) 98th Anniversary Convention. Anderson said his company will not pay a premium for non-GMO crops but will make every effort to help farmers find a market for their products.

"Biotechnology has the potential to change the face of global agriculture," said Anderson, who works for the nation's second-largest farmer-owned cooperative. "But we face fear, wrong perceptions, and threats to good science."

The world's population is expected to grow by 25 million people each year through 2020, creating an increasing demand for food. Anderson said projections indicate that the world marketplace will demand 40 percent more grains. The use of biotechnology would allow U.S. farmers to fulfill 60 percent of the world's cereal grain needs.

Anderson challenged the perception of many European Union countries that farm and food products containing GMOs are a potential health threat. A number of European grocery companies—from the United Kingdom's Edeka chain—do not sell products that contain GMOs. Scandinavia has laws making it illegal to import GMO products.

The real issue is whether European countries have sufficient regulatory and testing infrastructures to ensure a safe food supply, Anderson said. "The U.S. has better information to ensure food safety and satisfy consumer confidence."

Regardless of perceptions, Anderson said, even the EU's demand for non-GMO crops only will result in 10 to 20 percent of the world's grain being specially handled in costly ways to minimize GMOs from contaminating non-GMO grain. The remaining grain will be moved through conventional channels that do little to preserve a grain shipment's integrity and identity.

Anderson acknowledged that consumers would be more confident of GMO products if the frontline of the biotechnology revolution would have been focused on products that improve people's health. But the science of biotechnology is not that advanced.

"Biotechnology can make our lives better and the efficiencies on our farms better," he said. "The world community is going through some difficult times right now."

When there is a need to identify grain that does not contain GMOs and preserve its identity, testing products are available that can be used on the farm and in elevators to determine whether farm and food products contain GMOs.

Don Durondetta of Strategic Diagnostics Inc., a Delaware-based company that manufactures amino acid-based GMO test kits, said farmers can purchase test strips that allow them to determine whether a crop contains GMOs.

Using the same technology and strips as home pregnancy test kits, crop tests can be done on leaves, seed, or grain. The tests are accurate to 0.1 percent for soybeans and 0.5 percent for corn. Test strips are available for soybeans, corn, sugar beets, canola, and cotton.

"Without ever leaving the farm, farmers can determine whether there is one Roundup-Ready soybean in 1,000," Durondetta said.
