BEEF TIPS

Aging of beef helps tenderness; study reveals more

University of Nebraska beef scientist Chris Calkins is studying the ideal conditions for cooler aging of beef. Calkins found that large beef cuts aged at 30 degrees F, took 15 days to reach the same tenderness of beef aged at 38 degrees F for 11-12 days. Aging worked best for primal cuts. Smaller steaks and hamburger are packaged for aging and should not be kept in refrigerators for this long. The American Simmental Association is now sponsoring studies to identify through genetics the sires that produce the most tender and tasty meat.
