New Exhibition Showcases Ag Powerhouse

WASHINGTON, D.C. — On Thursday, U.S. Agriculture Secretary Dan Glickman helped open a new Smithsonian exhibition about the North American prairie — from its unique mix of flora and fauna to its huge agricultural output.

“Listening to the Prairie: Farming in Nature’s Image,” which opens to the public today, describes the evolution of the vast grasslands region as well as the progressive prairie farmers and ranchers who have found innovative new ways to farm the land and protect the environment.

Glickman, himself from the prairie state of Kansas said, “The prairies are the heart of America’s breadbasket, producing much of the nation’s corn, wheat, and soybeans. I hope this exhibit helps Americans better understand the vital contribution this region and its people make to the high quality of life we can all enjoy together.”

As a member of Congress, Glickman was the lead initial author in the House of Representatives of legislation to create a prairie designation with the national park system.

The exhibit will run through March, 2001. It will travel to 20 libraries across the country.
