Is This The Time To Sell Antiques, Collectibles?

If Christmas shopping and the recession have put a big hole in your bank account, this could just be the right time to unload antiques, collectibles and "junk."

Keep in mind that "beauty is in the eye of the beholder." The objects cluttering closets and garages can put money in your pocket. As one successful garage sale person told me, "Honey, people always buy junk...including me. Junk is irresistible."

At the top end of antiques is another theory that is proven; rare and costly antiques will always find a wealthy buyer or dealer.

Which means the average antique and collectible is left in limbo. In troubled financial times people crowd garage and estate sales hoping to either find a bargain or to parlay a two dollar purchase into a future $20 sale. How well the seller does depends on not only what he sells but where he sells it.

Many people do well with collectibles on the internet. Begin by seeing if there are items similar to yours listed, the asking price, and for how much do they actually bring.

Exposure is important and certainly the internet sites offer it.

Ever since Roadshow became a television happening, auction houses have been deluged with mail. So much so that they don't bother to answer unless the item is going to sell for big bucks. My own experiences with auction houses includes getting answers from Wm. Doyle Galleries. No answers in five different categories from Skinner. I like the way Butterfield and Butterfield, San Francisco, California, does it via the internet.

You scan a photo and e-mail it, with a letter describing the item. They e-mail back with an estimated value, and the rest is up to you.

Look in the antiques magazines for auctions. Items that fit into the auction houses specialties can do well. For instance medium range items in various collectibles categories do well at James D. Julia auctions in Fairfield, Maine. Toys, advertising items, and Victorian art glass are staples. Printed items, books, maps, and photographs do well at Swann Galleries in New York.

Don't be discouraged if you know you have an object worth more than a thousand dollars (you've researched), yet three auction houses have rejected it. The fourth may buy it.

Several years ago I submitted a Chinese calligraphy (book form), 18th century to three auction houses. It had been in the family for years, and I feared it would get damaged. The fourth auction house accepted it, although they didn't expect more than $1,000 for it Surprise! It sold for $25,000 after two Koreans fought it out.

Always insist on a reserve that means your object can't be sold under that price.

CLUES: Spend a few dollars on several of the Price Guides to get an idea of what your items could sell for. Warmen's, Kovel's, and Schroeder's are in most book stores. Be realistic about your treasures. Sentiment doesn't count. Expect less than half if you sell using their prices.

Unusual or one-of-a-kind antiques stand a better chance than mass-produced items.

Exceptions include Modernism pieces, Art Deco, and 20th century toys. Be aware of what 20th century items are popular with buyers. Remember just about everything is being collected — but isn't selling for big money.

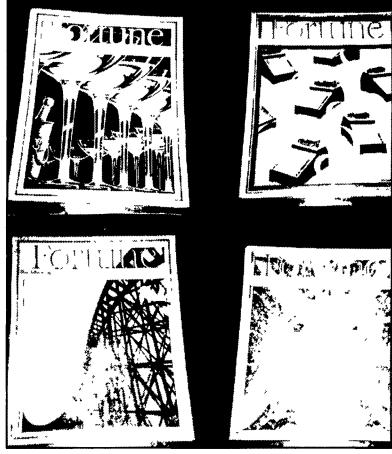

Old magazines can add up to good money depending on subject matter, condition and scarcity. Popular are those with old car advertisements or unusual covers. "Fortune" magazines from the 1930s-1940s can sell for $30 or more apiece. Covers and ads are taken apart by dealers and sold as art for $25 and up.

Those with art by famous illustrators such as Maxfield Parrish and Norman Rockwell are eagerly sought.

Take photos and small objects to the antique shows.
You'd be surprised how much money you can make with little treasures.

Dealers are always on the lookout.

Don't take junk to the shows. Have a garage sale for cheap, cheap prices. A good idea is a table with a sign reading "nothing over $1." People do love junk.
