19th century examples, silver mounted. Depending on the silversmith, auction prices can be $4,000 and up.

Carafes and jugs have been around since ancient times, but decanters didn't come into usage until the 15th century. The first examples were of dark-colored soda glass or clear lead glass. The term "decanter" was used in early 18th century England.

Shapes changed over the years, offering collectors a wide variety.

They can be found barrel-shaped, cut with flutes to imitate hoops and staves. Others are tapered or with downward-sloping shoulders. Ships decanters are almost a separate category. Their shapes, with wide bases, were made to lessen sliding at sea. Bar decanters, another type, can be recognized by their pewter stoppers.

By the 18th century decanters were being made in most countries of the world. A bit of research will help you recognize the enamel designs of Germany and Bohemia. The glass decanters made in Ireland were deeply cut and engraved. In all countries shape and design followed the prevailing designs and shapes of glass of the period; ie neo-classic and Georgian.

In post-Revolutionary America, glass decanters also used neo-classic motifs, as well as stars and European influences. However, by the 1820s the Bakewell glasshouse in Pittsburgh was turning out hundreds of cut glass decanters. The strawberry diamond pattern, also used in England, was the most popular. By the 1830s decanters with matching wine glasses were introduced. The Boston and Sandwich Glass Company, known for "lacy" pattern pressed glass at this time, also made decanters in blown mold patterns. Among their rarest are those in colors. When they come to auction they can sell for more than a thousand dollars. The good news is they still turn up in garage and estate sales, unrecognized and inexpensive.
