Antique Detective

triotic symbols, from stars to the flag, were used on every conceivable object, including furniture, textiles and toys.

Children learned early on about patriotism from their untrained artisan fathers and mothers. Imaginative toys and whirligigs with flags and Uncle Sam made with found materials now sell at auctions for thousands of dollars.

Women from the early 19th century to the 20th century created blankets and quilts with the stars and stripes as a subject. They also used them in hook rug designs.

You don't have to spend a lot to begin a collection. Such humble items such as postcards, sheet music and even match covers were produced in war time with patriot art. As Polak points out in his book, sheet music prices range from $15 to under $100.

Prices depend on age, condition and art work.

Postcards with patriotic themes were made from 1898 to 1918. Photo cards that showed young women with a flag or even a woman depicting Betsy Ross making the first American flag were popular. It was customary, until after World War 1 to send cards for the Fourth of July and Flag Day.

Old frames with carved, painted or molded patriotic symbols of eagles and flags still turn up for a few dollars at flea markets and garage sales. Another place to look are the rag bags at house sales and antique shops. There are textile treasures to be discovered.

Maybe they are a bit ragged. All you need is a remnant with a date and symbol.

CLUES: Probably one of the best places to go searching is the Internet.

Type in "patriotic memorabilia" and you're on your way. At antique shows and shops look in the display cases offering small objects. A grouping can make an interesting wall collection.

Along with patriotic symbols are the symbols of protest. They can also be part of such a collection, to give an historical perspective.
