Cooking History In Old Cookbooks, Pamphlets
Cookbooks don't have to date to the 19th century to be collectible.

In fact, collectors are honing in on the pamphlets and booklets from the early 20th century to the 1960s put out by food processing companies, such as Jell-O, Heinz and major appliance manufacturers such as General Electric. Like the earlier cookbooks they offer a history of what was popular. For instance, in the 1930s no luncheon was complete without a Jell-O mold.

The next generation found the recipes no longer in fashion and trashed the pamphlets and booklets. These days those items are being added to cookbook collections.

There were cookbooks published by women's magazines and city newspapers. By the 1940s, cookbooks were put out by churches and social groups as fund raisers, which is a practice that continues today.

The last major auction specializing in gastronomy (as it is known), was held at Sotheby's in 1984. It consisted of 1,500 bookery books, collected over the years by Marcus and Elizabeth Crahan. The earliest books in the collection dated from as far back as the Renaissance, covering five centuries. Not exactly the kind of thing you would thumb through with flour-covered fingers to duplicate the Lucrezia Borgia's last wine and cheese tasting.

The oldest known cookery book was documented in the
