We ought to make a very liberal allowance in discussing the political issues of the day, for the fact that for more than thirty-five years we have had a species of political North and a political South. The habit of a great public is not unlike that of an individual. They have a way of coloring subjects very similar; a way of imbibing prejudices and prejudging cases almost the same. Let us apply these suggestions to the Kansas controversy. There is in reality in that controversy, as it now stands, not one element of the old slavery quarrel. It has dwindled down into a dispute about the construction of laws-whether the act of 1854 conferred sufficient authority upon the people to authorize them to frame a State government? whether delegates elected by the people for specific purposes are to be presumed to express the will of the latter? Some few men, who never forget ty court in all this Union which is not called

We may here observe, as we mention no names, that this friend was out on election night, and anxious to hear the news from Maine, tarried long on the corners. The news came, but not until he had absorbed sufficient damp to give him the chills. Another friend invited him to take a glass of Scotch ale, which was put up in very black bottles. Our friend's thirst was hage, and was only quenched after a number of empty bottles stood before him; a cold in the head was the consequence, him; a cold in the which was put up in very black bottles.
