vancing, finally met with a heavy body of fresh troops thrown suddenly and vigorously against him, and was driven back over part of the ground he had just won. Ricketts' line was at the same time hard pressed, and became deserted. Mansfield, who had come over the creek the night before, was ordered into the woods, the night before, was ordered into the woods, to Ricketts' support, and Hartsuff's brigade, part of Doubleday's command, was sent to sus-tain Meade. Mansfield took the greatest part of his troops to Ricketts' help, but they were unable to extend their line, and in the effort to push forward his men, General Mansfield was mortally wounded. Generel Hartsuff advan-ced to the relief of Meade, with the 12th and ced to the relief of Meade, with the 12th and 13th Massachusetts, and another regiment.— The Pennsylvania troops were retiring in haste and some confusion. Hartsuff seized a brigade in front of the field, over which the rebels were pressing, and held it in splendid style for more than an hour, against a greatly superior attack. His men behaved most gallantly, standing on this exposed ground, firing steadily, and never

Gen. Hartsuff was very soon severely wour ded. His troops retained their position, and finally, by the precision and rapidity of their fire, compelling the enemy to retreat instantly, advanced in pursuit, while they had been en-gaged. Hooker ordered up Crawford's and Gordon's brigades to their support. Hartsoff retained the advance, and Crawford and Gorretained the advance, and Crawford and Gor-don followed in support. A rebel battery on the right, which had been most annoying by an enflading fire, was about the same time silenced by Doubleday's gun, and Hooker ordered his hole line forward.

The rebels were driven through the corn-field again into the woods beyond, where they could not easily be dislodged without artillery. Gen. Hooker, who all the morning had kept himself under the fire, and generally in the hottest of it. order forward to examine the ground in front, in order to plant a battery. As he rode up the hill he became a conspicious mark for the rebel sharpshooters; their fire increased very suddenly, and General Hooker was wounded in the left foot, a bullet passing entirely through it. The wound was excessively severe and painful, and he was compelled to leave the field. Three men were shot down by his side at the same moment he was wounded.

Crawford had found the rebels in great force in the woods, and was already in need of assisin the woods, and was already in need of assis-tance. Sedgwick's flank also became exposed on the left in consequence of the distance be-tween him and the other divisions. The rebels perceived their advantages, and at the same time pressing Crawford's line, which fell back wick's, broke Crawford's line, which fell back the field till his division retired. Gen. Howard then took command, and ordered the division in the rear. Major Sedgwick, aid of General Sedgwick, was shot through the body, but is not mortally wounded. Many of the regimmets suffered most severely. The 15th Massachu-ectts lost nine out of seventeen officers. Col. Hinks, of the 19th Massachusetts, was killed. Col. Wistar, 1st California, was severely woun-ded.
