> A FABLE Not from Æsop

Once upon a time there lived two brothers upon adjoining farms. The one was a large, stout, muscular man who looked as though he could whip his weight in wild-cats, and "didn't much deceive his looks." The other was small in stature, but his sinews were tought and wiry and his eye shot forth a glance of fire. For many years the two brothers lived side by side, in great harmony. Their substance increased, large families grew up around them, and they were really very prosmet, the subject was introduced by the Dad! big brother, and a dispute arose between them. The dispute soon became a serious quarrel and the quarrel, in due happening to look toward the prostrate form of his brother, he imagined that he perceived a faint glimmer of life in upon his prostrate brother's neck and crushed the life out of him forever.

The name of the big brother was North, that of the little one South.

This language is found in the platform of the Radical party of this State. Words are very cheap and it is an easy matter to fawn and flatter, but why did not these glorious friends of the soldier denounce Congress, their own Congress, for not making provision for the payment of the additional bounties? Ah! its party are in favor of the establishthere's the rub! The Secretary of the Treasury would willingly pay them, n y, he could not withhold payment, if he had the means wherewith to do it. And why is it that the treasury is exhausted? Soldiers, we will tell you! It is because the expenses of the Congressional Satraps who have been set up over the South, in order to Africanize that portion of the country, must be paid.
