THE DEAD ALIVE.

Hundreds of stories are related of the horrible deeds of the bodysnatchers, but among them all none is more remarkable and soul harrowing than the one just about to be narrated. The facts were given to tne writer recently, and it is believed that they are now published for the first time.

of these was a Mr. Bell, a young gentleman of twenty-five. He inherited a large estate from his uncle and soon afterward removed from his former abode to take possesion of the family mansion in Kilmare, He married the only child of a wealthy East India merchant residing at Liverpool, by whom he had two children. In the fourth year of their wedded life Mrs. Bell was taken suddenly ill, and expired the next day. The symptoms were o'a peculiar nature, and the limbs so increased in size immediately after death that a magnificent diamond ring of great value could not be removed from the lady's tinger, and was buried with her. Of course, this fact was well known to the inhabitants of Kilmare, as Mrs. Bell was the wife of the most considerable man there about, and naturally matter of conversation and rumor.

The old churchyard of Kilmate stood on the side of a bill, and immediately in the rear of the church and adjoining the chancel was the tomb of the Bell family. Here, in professional body-snatcher. accordance with immemorable ushe church.

Mr. Bell who was about retiring, went to an open window, and as he did so, fancied he saw a white figure crossing the lawn in front of the house. The next moment it disappeared, and, satisfying himself that he was the subject of a delusion, he commenced to un dress. Suddenly the clear tones of the door-bell rang through the building. Mr. Bell parsed and moved toward the door of the apartment to listen. In a few seconds the sound reverberated through the house, and Mr. Bell opened the door and stepped out into the corridor. At that moment, as he glanced down the stairway, he saw the housekeeper moving toward the front door. Then he heard her set the lamp she carried on the table, and open the lock and bolts of the massive door. Then a dreadful and prolonged shriek followed, and at the same moment Mr. Bell's butler ran along the hall toward the front door. Mr. Bell had reached the head of the stairs and was in the act of descending when the butler reached the spot where the housekeeper lay on the floor apparently in a swoon, What was Mr. Bell's surprise to see the butler raise his hands, fix his gaze upon the door, and then sink to the floor as though struck dead. Utterly bewildered and confounded Mr. Bell hastened down stairs. The sight that met his gaze when he reached the centre of the hall almost froze his blood. There stood the figure of his wife in her grave clothes, leaning against the pillar ofthe door, with one hand thrown across her breast. For a moment Mr. Bell was al nost overcome. Then he remembered the wite figure which he saw crossing the lawn a few seconds before the bell rang, and another glance showed him that the garments of the figure before him were dripping with rain.

"Julia, my darling, my wife !" Mr. Bell exclaimed, and stepped toward the figure,

It made a movement toward him, and the next instant it was enfolded in his arms. The scene that ensued baffles all description. It was indeed the wife but that day buried, who was restored to the arms of the bereaved husband and children. The explanation which she offered was very imperfect and unsatisfactory. For a short time after her she was placed in the coffin she lost from the finger of the dead. A sud- Ocean,

Soon after this extraordinary occurrence the vicar of the parish resigned his living and removed his family to England. Several years passed away, and the incidents herein accorded were almost forgotten. Mrs. Bell's father died, and Mr. Bell and his family quitted Kilmare and took up their residence at Toxteth, near Liverpool.

And now for the sequel.

During the Chartist riots in 1840, James Binus was arrested for mur der and lodged in Lancaster jail. He was tried, convicted and sentenced to be hanged. Before the last sentence of the law was executed he made a confession of many crimes, and, among the rest of his exploits, as a professional bodysnatcher, in which business he had been engaged for many years. The following facts are taken from his confession:

In July, 1820 he was living in Belfast, having fled from England to escape punishment for his offenses. He had done several small jobs in Belfast for the doctors, and on the night of July 2), in the year named a well-known physician of Belfast sent for him and told him that he had a very delecate piece of work to perform. A Mrs. Bell, a lady of great beauty, and the wife of a rich proprietor, had just died of a very peculiar disease, and the doctor and his associates desired the body to investigate the cause of death. The doctors paid him so much money down and dispatched him to Kilmare with such instructions as a ere necessary. He was to secure the corpse, and a coach would be ready at the churchyard gate in which there would be two assistants who would be ready to assist him at a given signal. He went to Kilmare on the day of the funeral, at which he was present. He examined the lock on the door of the vault, and was satisfied that he could ersily remove it. At midnight he went to the churchyard, armed with a wrench, a pair of shears, and a picklock. First satisfying himself that the coach was in readiness, he entered the graveyard and proceeded to the vault. The night was dark and rain was falling. To his surprise, he saw that the door was

SNAKE FASCINATION.

We borrowed from Forest and Stream, not long ago, a very interesting account of the movements of the black snake in exercising the singular charm over its victims that subjects them irresistably to its fatal power. In the case related, the fascination was exerted upon a human observer, who had strength to break the spell before it was completed. The paper which published the incident now brings forward another, of no less interest, in which a bird had fallen within the baleful influence of the charmer. The story is recounted by a witness of the scene, who on passing through the woods, one June afternoon, was aroused by hearing sterill, discordant notes, as of a bird whose nest is endangered. Pausing to investigate the cause, he discovered, about twenty feet from him, a cat-bird sitting on a horizontal branch of a low tree, and pouring out the tones that has arrested his It seemed in great distress (stated repeated the plaintive cries which first drew my attention to it. In all its seeming agony it moved not from the limb, but clung to it as if it were its only protection. In wonder I gazed, but not long. A rusting in the leaves below drew my eyes from the bird. Stooping, I crawled nearer and nearer, I looked again, and on the ground, beneath the branch on which the bird was perched, was a black snake from two and a half to three feet in length. with body in close coil, head erect. and moving with an undulating pendulous motion, tongue flashing, and eyes riveted on its victim only three feet above him. Again he rusted the leaves with his tai!, and, quickly withdrawing it, left but a small portion-perhaps three or four inches-out of the coil, which part he caused to vibrate with dazzling rapidity. The motion of its head increased. I fancied its eyes gained brilliancy in its eagerness. All this time the poor bird continued its cries and flutterings; but, as I watched, its struggles grew weaker, its flutterings less. It would sit for a time with drooping head and closed eyes, as though asleep, and then, as if suddenly awakened would feebly raise its wings and utter a low, sad cry. At last these ceased, and the poor bird, after vainly strugging to retain its hold upon the limb, fell as if lifeless to the ground. Immediately the snake uncoiled himself and stretched out his head to grasp the bird. At that moment bird from the ground, and, placing it in the palm of my hand, I could feel the violent pulsations of its heart, as, with closed eyes and tightly-clenched feet, it lay inanimate. I carried it quite a distance before the first signs of consciousness appeared. Then a tremor ran through its body, its feet unclasped, its wings made a slight motion, its eyes opened, and, raising itself on its feet, it stood tottering. Then, as if endued with new life and strength, its spread it wings and swiftly flew to its native woods.
