the cabinet, several foreign ministers, and many others holding high positions under the federal government, have devoted their attention almost exclusively to political partisan work, with a view of retaining the political control of some of the pivotal states. To aid in the work, the one hundred thousand employees of the government have been assessed upon their salaries to raise funds to control the elections. Syndicate banks have been favored in the sale of government bonds, and have without doubt returned Sherman's favors by liberal contributions. In addition to this the republican leaders demand that the polls shall be under the control of federal marshals supported by federal bayonets. The strides towards a condition of affairs in which a President can dictate his own successor, or that he shall have no successor during his lifetime, are both
