

Outside of "His Set."

One cool Sunday morning, about a dozen years ago, a young man, whom we shall here call Cabell, came out of a fashionable church, and avoiding the throng of carriages and gaily-dressed worshippers, strolled down a quiet street with a weary, bored look on his handsome face. Life had bored him a good deal lately. He had been born some twenty odd years ago in that stately house at the corner, where he still lived. He had inherited a good name and large estates, and he knew nobody who had not the same good fortune. When he was a baby, nurses and footmen protected him from contact with any children but those of his own rank; when he was a boy, a tutor prepared him alone for college; at college he was extremely careful to associate only with his equals. When he travelled he found in New York, London, Paris "his own set" living within inflexible barriers to keep off "canaille." He had a profession, but with such an income why should he practice? He had no relish for course

He was passing the great Penn Hospital at that moment, and sauntered into the grounds to look at some plants. He passed the quaint old building every day, but it never occurred to him to enter it. He did so now listlessly, scarce knowing where he went. One of the physicians recognized him and walked with him through the wards. Cabell looked at the poor creatures as he might at so many pictures of suffering. It never occurred to him that these were men of the same blood ties, passions, as the people of his set. "Who is that?" he asked, stopping suddenly. "That young man? He is about your age, Mr. Cabell, and positively he looks like you! He is a Norwegian, who landed here a year ago, with a little capital; fell a victim to typhoid and was brought to us when he had spent his last penny and pawned even his shoes. He is to be discharged to-morrow."

It may have been only the accidental likeness which interested Cabell, but he sat down by Lars Volk's bed and talked to him for an hour; heard the story of little Olga waiting to come out and marry him when he should have made his fortune by wood-carving; and of the long years of work which he had spent in earning the money to bring him to the New World.

"Come to me to-morrow," said Cabell, pressing the lad's thin hand heartily. Volk came, and received money as a loan to take his tools and cloth out of pawn. Mr. Cabell had gone about among his friends and procured orders for him, for Volk would take no money as a gift.

The boy's needs and his story and his gratitude were the opening of a new world to Cabell. He woke in the mornings with the sense that he had something to do and to expect. He had visited Norway and saw nothing but the scenery and the fishing-grounds. Now it was the home of little Olga and of old Jan and the violinist Bjorn, and all the good people of whom Volk told him. He found that there were other emigrants coming to the city every week, Swedes, Norwegians, Poles, Germans, Russians, each with his story of his old life broken up, and of his desperate venture to make his home in a country where all were strangers. Cabell would not let them call him a stranger.

It was so pleasant at this great crisis of their lives to step forward as their friend; to help them to find a place, work and home. Gradually he became interested in founding colonies in the West and South. He helped hundreds with his money and advice; his life became full. He walked now with a quick, decided step, and his eye was keen and friendly.

Foreign countries were no longer spaces on the map to him, but the homes of these his friends; of thousands more to whom he might be a friend. Sometimes he visited his colonies in Dakota, or Virginia; or, when he was in the city, spent an evening with Volk and his pretty wife in their lump little home. "Nobody," he used to say, "need complain of ennui, of want of work. The highest work is waiting for us in the street, next door, if we will open our eyes and see it." — Youth's Companion.
