EDITOR MCCLURE, of the Philadelphia Times, gets off the following bit of sarcasm, presumably to give those fault-finders, who hardly know what more to blame President Cleveland for, a little lift:

Doing Some Dreadful Things.

Everybody who knew anything at land would do something dreadful before he had been in office very long. As a small boy he had sometimes been known to pull the tail of his grandmother's eat and as a young man he was wont to climb up on the fire engines and get himself hauled to the scene of the conflagration, instead of running thence and arriving in a breathless condition. These were indications of moral depravity that could not but end in some awful way, and the dreaded climax appears to him he actually sat down. Everybody else expected to sit down, and afterwards did, but that does not mitigate the awful deed, The crushing fact remains that the President sat down first. No good could come of the boy who pulled his grandmother's cat's tail-everybody knew that -- but not even Grover Cleveland's best friends thought him capable of such moral depravity as this. There is no help for the country, either. It must stagger along under its dreary load as best it may venting its grief in sighs and secret lamentations and weeping itself to
