CONGRESS.

House of Representatives.

Friday, March 14.

In committee of the whole on Mr. Madison's resolutions.

Mr. Nicholas said he should not attempt to follow the gentleman last up thro' his eloquent address, or undertake to go into an answer of the variety of general charges brought forward against the resolutions.

He wished only to take notice of one of two points in the debate. It was said, that the exillence of the resolutions would rather be a bar to the termination of war than an inducement with our enemies to make a peace. Is it to be imagined, he asked, if Great Britain intends to drag us into a war, that she will abandon it without being compelled?—When forced to the necessity of wishing for peace, will she not be disposed to grant us some advantages to have her commerce with us put in as favorable a situation as before hostilities, by a relaxation, at least, of those resolutions. But are we prepared to say, that after being dragged into a war we are willing to make peace without obtaining some security that we shall not be molested in future? If he understood what a conduct truly dignified on such an occasion ought to be, we should insist not only on a reparation of the injury and insult, but shew to the world that after obtaining complete satisfaction we were determined to obtain security against future aggressions.

The present measures did not, as has been asserted, originate in favoritism, they are not intended to repay a debt of gratitude, they are drawn forth by the injuries inflicted by one nation and are meant to benefit the country for which we are sent to legislate. If, however, in their operation they should benefit France this was surely no argument against them, on the contrary it ought to be an additional argument in favor of them as we owe that nation a debt of gratitude.

Mr. Kittera rose to call the attention of the committee to the immense waste of time which the discussion of these resolutions had occasioned. Two months had been in a great measure spent in discussing them. It was like consulting on the improvements to be made to an edifice threatened by a conflagration. He hoped the question would be taken.

Mr. Page I acknowledge that the detention of our posts; the indian war in consequence of that detention; the Algerine piracies which are supposed to be derived from the same source, and the violation of our rights as a neutral nation, might furnish Congress with justifiable reasons for a declaration of war: but if war with Britain and her allies be considered as a greater evil than a war with the Indian tribes; the depredations of the Algerines, and of British cruisers, and the insult to the Flag of the United States, Congress ought not to declare war; nor to take any steps which may involve the United States in hostilities—nor ought they to shew a disposition to put any other construction on the proceedings of the British government, than they have publicly avowed; and as the United States have so long evidenced to the world their disinclination to make a common cause with their allies, who undoubtedly have less need of our assistance now, than they had when Congress first met, and the enemies of our allies, particularly Britain, (though she indeed, some time since, when flushed with a prospect of success, issued orders of a hostile nature against us) in all probability will soon be disposed to peace.

I say as this is the case, I cannot be induced to believe that the United States are in danger of a war with Britain; and to shew my disposition to preserve peace with her, I prefer entering into regulations of
