From the (Baltimore) FEDERAL GAZETTE.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman of this town (now in Paris) to his friend here, dated July 22d, 1796.

"I confess I like France wonderfully, particularly Paris—although it must be allowed that here the moral duties, such as religion, chastity, &c. are laughed at. Amusement and present enjoyment is sought after by all ranks and ages—nevertheless, amongst the crowd, characters of real sterling value may be frequently met with—and certainly the infinite variety of entertainments, by which time may be easily and innocently enjoyed, reconciles one shortly, perhaps too soon, to the absence of those more solemn duties, which education has fixed in the mind. Religion, 'tis true, is no more! chastity is rare! honesty is divided by self-interest!—all that remains of the first is fixed internally, but externally destroyed! the second may be found, but the public practice of it, even in appearance, would be ridiculous, because the triumph of nature is considered as that of reason—and dishonesty is every where guarded against by cunning or prudence. The absence then of these virtues is not looked upon as injurious to society, and on the other hand every creature being in pursuit of what constitutes individual happiness, it becomes a matter of no concern to others, what may be my pursuits, unless self-interest may be affected. Go where you will, all appear happy and contented (politics out of the question.)

"There are eighteen theatres, every one of them crowded each night in the week, and some of them contain 10,000 souls—The public gardens and walks are innumerable, and never empty.—Fire-works, concerts, public balls, which you will see the African dance with the European, and the natives of Asia, with those of America; in short, where every creature is upon an equal footing) are every night, and almost every where—Conceive a walk surrounding the inner part of this great city: that is, a circle far within its outer limits, that goes directly round, except where it is cut off by the river, above and below; without it are streets without number, within it, the most populous part of Paris; this street then, with a row of trees on each side, and a walk between them and the houses, may be about ten miles round; nevertheless, every evening the old, painted most ridiculously, the young, most lamentably—men, women and children here assemble; chairs innumerable are placed, and this immense walk may be undertaken with males and females, seated promiscuously on both sides for the whole distance!—Search all the world, and Paris with all its stinks, and God knows it is filthy enough, is the place maugre all its imperfections, which stands superior to all others under heaven, if there was no other thing to make it so, but the single entertainment of "the gallery of paintings," which is 570 yards in length and contains the works of the noblest painters the world ever produced, selected from every country into which French success has penetrated—Here every stranger is permitted to enter whenever he pleases."

Extract of another letter from a gentleman of this town, now at Paris, to his friend here, dated 23d July, 1796.

"The rapid successes of the republic absolutely dazzles the imagination, and would be held romantic, if related to have happened in former times.—The brilliant exploits of Buonaparte, for rapidity, far exceed the memorable actions related of Alexander. This young commander has the glory of conquering Italy, in less time than a connoisseur would take in examining its curiosities; and in a short time, the extensive gallery of paintings will contain innumerable testimonies to posterity, of every work of art, sent by him from the cities, where he planted in their stead, the standard of the republic. The emperor is exhalted, and it is even said that he is become melancholy. It is certain ambassadors arrived here from Germany the day before yesterday. I have it from respectable authority, that their first audience took place yesterday.—They were introduced into the hall of the directory.—They were received with the utmost solemnity.—Carnot was the organ of his compeers—"This paper," said he, presenting it to the ambassadors, "contains the terms upon which we are willing to make peace: from them we will never recede, unless obliged to do it on our knees. The meeting is finished," added he; and without deigning to speak another word, the directory retired. Methinks I see the astonished princes (for to be sure they are nothing less) of the most Holy Empire too.—No doubt the best orator among them was prepared to make a long speech; but, alas! how are the mighty cast down! the creck fallen Austrians must bow to republican sternness, and accept of such conditions as it shall please them to offer. Believe there is much dissatisfaction however reigning at present at Paris, nor will it surprise me to witness a speedy explosion. Rumors of fresh plots are every hour in circulation; anonymous papers are constantly handing about.—Last night there were thousands distributed, calling upon the people to rouse themselves, and meet in various places to form associations. The executive are very strong, and the military guard will, whenever six or eight people assemble together, interpose and disperse them: this I have been a witness of. Perhaps nothing is more alarming than the discontents of the soldiery. The government itself is supported by military force; nevertheless, one of the encampments in the vicinity of the city lately mutinied, in consequence of their pay being made in mandats, now at 96 per cent. discount, and for which no estate can be procured. This body of men were instantly removed to another place; but it is now said their successors exhibit the same disposition. Buonaparte is recalled, and Hoche, who has so fortunately terminated the internal war, was appointed in his room. This was intended when the former accepted the command; but it is said the directory thinks Buonaparte too much the friend of Talien."
